

specific

in analysis

A term which expresses qualitatively the extent to which other substances interfere with the determination of a substance according to a given procedure. Specific is considered to be the ultimate of selective, meaning that no interferences are supposed to occur.

Source:

PAC, 1983, 55, 553 (Recommendations for the usage of selective, selectivity and related terms in analytical chemistry) on page 555